in 1963 president kwame nkrumah argued that a union government for africa would ultimately be the most effective vehicle for africa s social political and economic emancipation at that time there was significant dissension and disagreement on this point the organisation of african unity oau was formed as a compromise between those who wanted immediate continental integration and those who saw benefits in retaining a degree of national sovereignty and autonomy in managing their internal affairs forty four years after nkrumah s visionary proposal the leadership of the african union au the successor organisation to the oau is still grappling with the issue of whether to forge a union government for africa this book will contribute to this ongoing debate by drawing together the views of a selection of au officials au member state representatives policymakers researchers academics and civil society representatives the chapters contained in the book will discuss the challenges and opportunities facing the proposed union government for africa this introduction will contextualise the debates leading up to the union government discussions and also outline the content and structure of the book substantial social and economic progress in sub saharan africa during the past 15 years has not altered the traditional regime of very high fertility explanations for this paradox have to turn to broad societal characteristics not captured by multivariate analysis of the household level the search for physical survival promotes a very large family norm high fertility may also reflect the predicament of the african woman this paper argues that enough is known to provide a reliable basis for policies aimed at reducing fertility the case for such policies rests on evidence that the challenge posed by accelerating population growth in africa has not elicited a commensurate response in the form of technological or organizational progress instead growing population numbers have accentuated the food deficit magnified the budgetary problem of financing basic needs services and complicated the employment issue the paper projects future population growth of nine sample countries accounting for two thirds of africa s total population on the basis of four sets of assumptions these exercises confirm the desirability of action by african governments to reduce fertility
